You are here State and Federal Resources New Facilities and Technologies Accelerate Evaluation Process A group of faculty, staff and students at the University of North Dakota (UND) in Grand Forks are making a difference by creating a science-based peer review and grading process to evaluate undergraduate student research. In December 2015, UND's Major Lab Scholars' Program (MLS), a program that pairs 15 students with faculty mentors to design and conduct innovative research projects, launched a pilot peer review system to evaluate projects. At first, the students were evaluated by one member of the faculty, and later, by two. They were then scheduled to deliver oral presentations of their projects at the UND Undergraduate Research Symposium (URS) event. To facilitate the project evaluation, each student was given a questionnaire. To complete their peer-review scores, students could also complete an online assignment or select to write a personal reflection that was peer-reviewed by their faculty mentor. The peer-review results are then summarized by URS faculty and used to grant or deny a student's proposal at the next URS student presentation. "The peer review process allows students to do something that is not really being done elsewhere and, at the same time, it's less of a burden for the students who are currently in their research," says Nick Ruhl, a MLS major who is also the director of the UND Research Repository and has mentored previous cohorts of the students. "This is a more objective and accurate form of assessment," Ruhl says. "Rather than solely relying on what the instructor thought of the project, [the students] can take part in the project and have their peers review it. It gives us an opportunity to be more accurate in how we grade student-faculty relationships, and this process is a mechanism for assessing how [the student] performed
