In experiments on 12 dogs artificial bile was infused into the duodenum for a period of 30 minutes. The infusions were carried out without, and in presence of Ca²⁺ (0.5%) and Mg²⁺ (0.1%). Under all conditions marked hypercholinism was observed, the initial and the most pronounced effects being after bile infusion in absence of intracellular cations, as well as after bile infusion after cation blockade. The potentest stimulant on cholinomimetic effect was Ca²⁺. The correlation of cholinomimetic effect with its essential component (bile hydroxyproline content) gives evidence to the fact that cholinomimetic properties of bile may be caused by the high content of hydroxyproline in this secretion. Following bile infusions the content of total phospholipids and the activity of cholinesterase were increased which, to a large extent, is a result of a more rapid transfer of these substances from the liver tissue into the blood. The data obtained allow to suggest that changes in cholinergic properties of the bile in the duodenal infusion in presence of Ca²⁺ and Mg²⁺ are due to their action on the membrane phospholipids. A teenager in Australia could soon get a new opportunity to make her mark on the music scene, as it's been announced the country will become the first in the world to test drive the self-driving Nissan Serena minivan. According to V Autoparts, the trial will examine the vehicle's ability to operate autonomously in a variety of operating modes, including the VAN version of autonomous emergency braking.
