“I am the governor, and I am telling you, God dammit, I know what I am doing,” Bercow said as he told MPs the prime minister was “mentally ill”. The show of force is a key part of the opposition’s strategy to oppose the PM’s Brexit deal, following the votes in Parliament earlier this week which effectively killed off the prime minister’s plan for an early general election. The government has so far been unable to attract the 10 MPs needed to get its deal through Parliament, but says the new measures are designed to turn around the mood at Westminster. Asked by the BBC’s Andrew Marr Show why he would want to stop the government’s deal from passing, Bercow replied: “The right to remain of course, not to be bullied, not to be browbeaten, and to say that the prime minister does not know what she is doing. “The prime minister in this, we have had a leader who in his heart doesn’t want to be prime minister, and I believe that he is sick in the head. “I have no doubt whatsoever that he is mentally unstable. I think the way he goes about his business is to try to get his own way, and to use the tools of state power to browbeat and bully and shout and scream. “And he has lost a lot of respect among his colleagues for having done that, I am afraid.” Bercow – the longest-serving speaker of the House of Commons – described the government as “ignorant, incompetent and intellectually lazy” for “ignoring what the public wants”. “They say they want no deal. They should just be honest with the public and say it,” he said. “What I want is an honourable deal, but they are not prepared to do that. And they don’t have the right to do that.” Bercow – who was first elected as Speaker in 1999 – added

Bizarre, almost surreal: At a frantic "Dance Party" at the Westlake Gymnasium, with several hundred cheering kids chanting "Let's Go Seahawks," the band played a song about the Oregon Ducks. A song about the Ducks? Yes. And the crowd had caught on. They began chanting, "Let's Go Marshawn Lynch." Yes, again. On and 2d92ce491b
