Korg Legacy Collection M1 v1.7.0. Korg Legacy Collection M1 v1.7.0 WIN OSX Incl Keygen-AiR. Provinces, states, and territories The provinces, states, and territories of Canada are among the few areas that have no inherent constitutional status.

The Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of Canada (the latter being the current form of government of Canada) make no direct mention of the provinces, states, and territories. The 1867 British North America Act and the 1982 Constitution Act established the provinces and territories, and the Constitution Act, 1982 stipulated the exclusive functions of the Parliament of Canada within each region. Although the use of the term provinces dates to the United Provinces of Canada, the term did not become common until the mid-19th century. The 1867 Canadian constitution is the first instance of the term "provinces" being used in the Canadian context. The term "provinces" did not appear in any of the original constitutions for the various provinces.

Rather, the term "states" was used in Ontario and Quebec. The 1867 federal constitution referred to the territories as "distant parts of the province" and, later, as "outlying portions of the province". The 1869 federal statute (now the British North America Act) referred to the "civil subdivisions" and the "county, township, and district" of the provinces. This lack of constitutional recognition has led to some legal issues. According to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia in Torres v. British Columbia (Attorney General), citizens of Vancouver Island who purchase property in Vancouver are subject to the laws of British Columbia. The Court of Appeal of British Columbia's reasoning was that citizens of Vancouver Island are citizens of British Columbia because of the proximity of Vancouver Island to Vancouver. Municipalities The provinces, states, and territories have no inherent constitutional status; their constitution is based upon that of the provinces, states, and territories of British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, and Quebec. In addition, the provinces have their own municipal systems (i.e., municipalities) distinct from those of the province and the three other territories. Provinces The provinces of Canada are British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and New Brunswick. The modern Constitution Act, 1982, does not set out distinct provisions for the governance of the provinces.
