I am running DOS on a Windows 8.1 computer, and I do not have access to the. As much as I'd like to work this out on my own, I'd be a fool if I did it that way. A: If you run git from a different computer, you won't be able to check out the code. If you were to run the "git clone" command from the terminal, you would be able to use it. If you want to run the command from your terminal, you need to add the following to your .gitconfig file. [alias] clone =!git clone -b $(git rev-parse --abbrev-ref HEAD) $(git config -l --get remote.origin.url) upload =!cp -r /home/user/Desktop/test/ /home/user/Desktop/test.git --preserve-modifiers Having done this, you could run the command git clone new_name.git to upload the repo to another location. As your question doesn't cover uploading the repo to another location, I can't help with that. Hope this helps!
