When writing a screenplay, film is divided into acts. In the screenplay format, acts are written in pairs, each one followed by a short paragraph that provides background information for the material in the preceding act. Act 1 | Act 2 | Act 3 | Act 4. In the screenplay format, acts are written in pairs, each one followed by a short paragraph that provides background information for the material in the preceding act. Every act has a single scene, and the scene always starts with a verb, which is usually “to be.”

For example, the scene in Act 1 of the screenplay for The Deer Hunter starts with “It’s five o’clock in the morning in Russia, and they’re all getting ready to go hunt.” Writing the First Act Scene | Writing Act 2 Scene | Writing Act 3 Scene | Writing Act 4

Scene. Writing the First Act Scene (Act 1) What is the job of the first act? In a movie, the first act tells the story of the protagonist’s life and the events in that life that led him to the beginning of the film, or what is called the “situation.” The first act typically provides the reader or viewer with a deeper understanding of the protagonist’s motivation and his drive to seek a change in the situation. For example, in The Deer Hunter, this is the time when Lt. Nick Corvo (Kurosawa) is training with the Russian army in Siberia. Write the First Act Scene Select the first act scene and outline it according to these guidelines: In every script, the scene always starts with a verb. There are a few exceptions: some dialogue scenes, for example, don’t begin with a verb. However, a novel, short story, or script usually starts with a “to be” verb—for example, “It’s five o’clock in the morning in Russia, and they’re all getting ready to go hunt.” However, a dialogue scene usually doesn’t start with a verb, since it’s not part of the main action of the scene. The scene always has a protagonist and a conflict. This is also true for a movie that is being adapted from a book or play. For example, in The Deer Hunter, the first act starts with “It’s five o’clock in the morning in Russia, and they’re all getting ready to go hunt.”
