Although using an SSL/TLS certificate (or encrypted tunnel) for outbound traffic protects against a MitM attack, it provides no security against a man-in-the-middle attack that provides itself as an intermediary between the website (initiator) and the requested resource (acceptor). This means that the resource could be redirected to a malicious resource on a different (trusted) server. The OpenID Connect authentication flow works as follows: When a user visits a website, a new request is made to the identity provider (IDP) to verify the identity of the user The IDP responds to the request by redirecting the user to the website (initiator) that requests authentication for the user. At the time of authentication, the user is redirected to the resource where the request for authentication was initiated. Verification and decision (enable-deny) of authentication requests by the IDP is performed as follows: The initiator exchanges the ID token with the IDP for verification purposes. The IDP authenticates and verifies the ID token The IDP sends a response to the initiator. This response is used by the initiator to determine whether the user is granted access to the target resource or not. If the request is approved the IDP sets a cookie on the initiator that stores the IDs of the user. This is called a session cookie. When the user makes an API request to the target resource, the initiator issues a request to the IDP to re-authenticate the user by sending the cookie to the IDP. The IDP authenticates and verifies the cookie and sends a response to the initiator. If the request is approved the IDP sets a cookie on the initiator that stores the IDs of the user. This is called a session cookie. 3ef4e8ef8d
