Product Users. AutoCAD LT/PLT 2018/2019. Mast cells in human fetuses. The developmental changes of mast cells in human fetuses have been studied. Using thin-section electron microscopy and immunohistochemistry, the presence and number of mast cells were found in different tissues of human fetuses at different stages of gestation ranging from the first trimester to adult human fetuses.
In skeletal muscles, nerve trunks and ganglia, mast cells were located both in connective tissue and in the muscle tissue proper and seemed to be activated by immune reactions. In lung and liver, mast cells were rarely present, but when present, appeared to be activated by foreign proteins. In spleen, thymus and umbilical cord vessels, no mast cells could be detected. In systemic vascular organs, in particular in the pancreas, liver, stomach, and duodenum, mast cells were constantly present, but appeared to be inactive. The present findings, together with previous reports, lead to the conclusion that in human fetuses mast cells develop in a tissue-specific manner and seem to be activated by different factors. In systemic organs, mast cells are constant in number, whereas in gastrointestinal organs and in sensory and parasympathetic ganglia, their number seems to be reduced. Add-on Interventions in Early Chronic Kidney Disease: Hypotheses and Evidence. Early chronic kidney disease (CKD) is potentially reversible with early treatment of risk factors such as hypertension and dyslipidemia. CKD leads to gradual decline in GFR, and patients are likely to develop end-stage renal disease (ESRD). To halt the disease progression of
