»This invention relates generally to the construction of
structural beams and,

more particularly, to an apparatus and method for automatically applying an adhesive to the end portions of a structural beam. Structural beams are typically utilized for the support of various structural components, such as, for example, supporting a subfloor of a building, supporting various components of the building, and the like. Adhesive is commonly applied to the exposed surface of a structural beam to facilitate the joining of various components to the beam. However, the conventional method of applying the adhesive to the beam involves manually spreading a bead of adhesive across the end portions of the beam and affixing the adhesive to the exposed surface of the beam. This is labor intensive and may also leave the adhesive in contact with the underlying subfloor, potentially causing the subfloor to become soiled with adhesive. Further, the application of

adhesive to the end
portions of the beam is often repetitive and awkward in that the
adhesive is frequently
applied using a tape
measure, which results in
