The efficacy and tolerability of ketoprofen otic solution (sucrose-based) to treat acute otitis externa in children were evaluated. Following a 4-week baseline period, 69 children (mean age 8.2 years) with dermatological conditions, including atopic eczema, but no ear infections, were randomized to receive either ketoprofen otic solution at a dose of 2.5-5 mg/kg/day or placebo (double-blind) daily for 10 days. Patients and parents evaluated the symptoms of otitis externa using a 10-point visual analogue scale. The overall physician assessment of treatment efficacy was significantly better in the ketoprofen-treated group than in the placebo group at the end of treatment ( $P = 0.03$ ). This difference in physician evaluation was most apparent in the younger children (5-10 years old) ( $P = 0.04$ ). There was no significant difference between the two groups in post-treatment parent and child assessments of treatment effectiveness. There was no significant difference between the two groups in compliance and side-effects. A significant difference in the mean severity of otitis externa score was observed between the ketoprofen group and the placebo group in children over the age of 10 years ( $P = 0.03$ ).
