Can the prognosis of cerebral palsy patients treated early in life be predicted from the motor and neuromotor skills of their parents? A controlled cohort study. To examine whether parental motor skills measured at the age of one year could predict a low motor level in the children by age four. From the Nijmegen Longitudinal Study on Cerebral Palsy, the parents of 60 children born in 1991 with cerebral palsy and their siblings were investigated at 1-year-old. The parents were matched to 60 control children who had no physical or mental disabilities. They were asked about their motor skills. Then, the children's motor performance at 4 years was assessed using the Gross Motor Function Measure (GMFM-66). The logistic regression analysis showed that the prognosis of the children was predicted by the motor skills of the parents at age one. The larger the parent's difference in motor skills in the prediction model, the worse the prognosis. The model that consisted of GMFM-66 and the parents' motor skills at age one explained 45% of the variance in motor performance at age four. The children of the parents with low motor skills had a poor prognosis and needed more support at the age of four. The role of the parents' motor skills in the prognosis of the children should be acknowledged in clinical practice.
