This week I was standing around talking to some friends and someone asked me when I thought Open Source would be more prevalent in the Enterprise. I tried to give an answer, but I was not prepared to speak up because I was caught off guard by the question. I wasn't sure if this was a rhetorical question; so I started to go for the jugular. It is a good question, especially with the advent of the cloud as well as mobile. The main concern is who decides the value of Open Source? Certainly there are products out there for Enterprise that are Open Source and have a very strong community, for example Red Hat Linux, Fedora and CentOS. This is just scratching the surface of the possibilities of Open Source. I can only assume that the people who ask this question are thinking "How can I use Open Source in my enterprise." As a customer what do I look for? I look for Open Source that is free. I look for a vendor who has the capabilities to scale an Open Source solution to a larger environment. I look for a vendor with a strong reputation as a vendor who is willing to provide solutions for both on premise and the cloud. And I look for a vendor that offers enterprise level support that makes me feel secure. The last point is important to me as an IT executive. It is important that I have a vendor that I can trust to help me if I get into trouble. I definitely do not want to have to rely on a vendor that I do not trust. Then the question is which Open Source solution do I want? As a technology executive, I think this is a very important question. It is important to start with a clear vision in mind. The first thing I want to do is identify the problem that I need to solve. Then I want to determine if that problem is "better" that is if it can be solved with Open Source. Then I need to know if that solution is
