Those are the key features. It's not a smart car, it's a semi and it's going to be electric. Meanwhile, the backlash over Tesla's battery-car ambitions continues. New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, whose auto-industry supports include GM and Ford, is now leading a campaign to get the city to back out of Tesla's plans for an employee-owned electric car-only charging network in the five boroughs. "We think there's a lot of political and social science [in the report]," says O'Toole. "I've been in this business for a long time. This is a debate that has been going on for 20 years, and this is the best sense of what the options are." The report argues that, if approved, Tesla's network could turn out to be a failure: Some of its stations are old and won't function (because they won't be redesigned after recharging); many EVs are too small to use the network (the big semi 09e8f5149f
