Circadian rhythmicity of the mood syndrome and personality traits were assessed in a sample of 17 patients with bipolar disorder and in 17 controls. The study consisted of two sessions within a day, one in the evening and one in the morning. Both clinical symptoms and personality traits exhibited a nocturnal and diurnal variation. Patients with bipolar disorder did not differ significantly from controls on the circadian cycle of moods, clinical symptoms, and personality traits. The study was limited by the few patients studied. The sample size was also small and limited to patients with bipolar disorder. Therefore, caution is warranted in generalizing findings from this study. Nevertheless, our data suggest that circadian rhythmicity is a phenomenon that is not specific to bipolar disorder.A comparison of recombination rates and genetic maps of 12 maize chromosome arms and 7 wheat chromosome arms. The amount of genetic distance between loci in the total genome varies from a few centiMorgans (cM) for telomeres to over 500 cM for centromeric regions. The map units and genetic distances of chromosome regions are useful tools for tracing and analyzing the origin and history of chromosomes during evolution. However, most of the studies on this topic have been based on experimental mapping techniques, which involve labor-intensive, time-consuming and expensive techniques. Thus, a simple and accurate method is needed for determining the amount of genetic distance. In this study, we developed a model, based on recombination rates of different maize chromosome regions and the genetic distances derived from the physical maps of 12 chromosome regions and the genetic distances derived from the sequences of 7 wheat chromosome arms (5B, 6A, 7A, 2D and 3B), to estimate the genetic distance of chromosomes and chromosome arms. The average genetic distances between predicted recombination rates and their corresponding genetic distances are similar to the
