Because gliomas are the most malignant primary brain tumors, there is a need for improved therapeutic approaches. The present study examined the growth-inhibitory effects of 5-azacytidine (5-aza-CR, 5-aza-2'-deoxycytidine) on human glioma xenografts (HGx). Mice received 60 mg 5-aza-CR/kg body wt/day intraperitoneally starting 10 days after implantation of HGx. The dose and schedule were selected on the basis of our previous pharmacokinetic studies in nude mice with five drugs at this dose. Control animals received an equal volume of the vehicle. After 50 days, the tumor volume was significantly smaller (p Arrowhead adds a new picnic table at airport Recreation officials announced the addition 09e8f5149f

Now, a troubling new study suggests that a single gene, MURF2, can cause abnormal growth and development in mouse embryos and children. The new study links MURF2 to an inherited disorder called Rubinstein-Taybi syndrome, which causes an enlarged head and hands. MURF2, or MYO18B, has no known role in normal growth and development or in diseases, but its genetic mutation in humans is linked to an increased risk of autism. Tobias Marschal and colleagues, including David Grunfeld, of the Stanford University School of Medicine, found that mice with altered versions of MURF2 suffered from grossly abnormal growth of the head. It's thought that abnormal growth of the fetal brain may lead to autism. The researchers used embryonic stem cells to produce mice with altered versions of MURF2, and they found that the mice grew abnormally large heads and abnormally large brains. The mutations caused cortical tissue in the mice to become too dense, resulting in an enlarged head, according to the study published online May 9 in Nature Genetics. Unlike other mouse models of autism, which cause social deficits, this abnormal development of the brain mimics the disorder's most pronounced clinical symptoms, says Marschal. The scientists also found that the altered MURF2 gene caused mice to have an increased amount of a protein called Smurf1. When they bred the mice with mice that had a mutation in Smurf1, the

The EPI presents a clearer picture of the best and worst metro areas and demonstrates that, despite stagnant real GDP growth and increasing income inequality, improving performance is still within reach for many metro areas. Top-performing large metro areas outperform the nation as a whole (by 70 points) in job creation. And in contrast to recent decades, these metro areas are expanding. As EPI has found, even after recession, the fastest-growing large metro areas in America are growing faster than some of their national peers. The big winners — like Salt Lake City, San Antonio, Denver, Portland, and San Jose — are not necessarily those with the most natural advantages — a low cost of living, proximity to educational and research institutions, high-tech industries, top universities, etc. — but they have a willingness to take risks and invest their resources. Advertisement How we got to the Top 50 The EPI was created to identify where are best positioned to continue to make progress in the face of the severe economic and quality-of-life challenges posed by the twin epidemics of obesity and chronic illness. The first step in creating the EPI was to use data that tracks changes in economic, environmental, health and quality-of-life performance at the same-size-metro-area level. Next, we assessed those areas on a specific set of criteria that would be most helpful in characterizing the nation's best performers. The criteria were selected because they are relevant to national health, and because they address well-established measures of quality of life, including economic status, state income levels, environmental conditions, and access to quality health care. Many national publications use a range of criteria. The EPI uses data that collects broad information on each of the individual criteria, then weights them.
